

LETTER OF RECOMMENDATION

To Whom It May Concern:

I, Anthony Sinclair, Editor of Congress.net, express my professional support for Nataliia Fursenko, PhD in Law, a researcher and expert in international law, migration, human rights, and legal technology.

I became acquainted with her professional work through our editorial collaboration. This letter reflects my editorial assessment of her expert approach and areas of professional activity.

I see the professional value of Nataliia Fursenko's work in her combination of academic training and practical understanding of the challenges arising from the interaction of different legal systems. She examines migration and cross-border matters in relation to the protection of human rights, family life, access to information, and legal certainty.

Particular attention should be given to her Legal Bridge Method, a methodology for legal adaptation that brings together the assessment of individual circumstances, identification of applicable legislation, legal education and strategic planning, systemic protection, and scientific documentation.

In my view, a distinctive feature of this approach is its structured integration of comparative legal analysis and practical guidance. It addresses a significant problem: individuals navigating multiple legal systems need to understand not only individual rules, but also how those rules interact, the sequence of steps required, and the consequences of their decisions.

Another area of her work is LegalPilot, a project in the field of artificial intelligence and legal technology.

Official project website: <https://legalpilot.net>

LegalPilot aims to facilitate access to legal information and navigation of migration and cross-border matters. The project addresses an issue of public importance: making complex legal processes easier to understand while maintaining information quality and distinguishing between general legal information and individual legal advice.

From an editorial perspective, the value of Nataliia Fursenko's work lies in her ability to connect discussions of technological change with people's specific legal needs. Her professional activities bring together international law, legal adaptation, and the use of technology to improve access to legal information.

My support is grounded in the independence of her analytical approach, the substantive connection between her research and practical work, and her ability to contribute meaningfully to public discussion. Her expert perspective is relevant to audiences seeking to understand the implications of changes in migration regulation and the digital transformation of the legal sector.

I believe that Nataliia Fursenko's continued professional work in the United States could benefit discussions concerning cross-border legal adaptation, legal education, and the responsible use of artificial intelligence. Her experience working with different legal systems could enrich the comparative analysis of these issues.

For these reasons, I recommend Nataliia Fursenko as a qualified legal expert and researcher. I express my professional support for her research activities and the continued development of her Legal Bridge Method and LegalPilot project.

I am available to confirm the circumstances of our editorial collaboration and provide further clarification regarding the professional assessment expressed in this letter.

Sincerely,

Anthony Sinclair
